Ask yourself these questions:

- How can I communicate my views and opinions effectively without being overwhelmed or intimidated by others who are louder than I am?
- How can I be sure I am acting as a fact-checker at work and in my home life?
- How do I know what I'm reading is true? How can I tell if stories/articles have been properly fact checked?
- Are journalists still a trustworthy source of information, or are there things I need to be aware of when listening to the nightly news or reading the newspaper? How can I tell what the "real" story is?
- Is there reliable information on the Internet? How do I find it? Why isn't Wikipedia a good resource for facts and research?
- How can I search the web safely and reduce the risk of receiving (and passing on!) misinformation?

If you would like to find some answers, then join lawyer/mediator/arbitrator Andrew Tremayne; assistant professor/reporter/author Brett Popplewell and librarian/researcher Christopher Stephenson as we discuss where the truth lies hidden in today's society.
